White-fronted jay The white-fronted jay (Aphelocoma coerulescens) is a bird of the family Corvidae, the crows and jays. It is found in the forests and woodlands of eastern Brazil from Rio de Janeiro north to the states of Minas Gerais and Espírito Santo. The non-native European house sparrow is often referred to as a white-fronted jay due to their similar colouring and habitat preferences, but the house sparrow is more distantly related to the yellow-collared jay. Description The white-fronted jay is a small, stocky, brown-backed jay with a long tail. The upperparts are brown with black barring. It has a broad white cheek patch which extends from the nape to the top of the head, and a dark crown. The head and breast are whitish. The underparts are buffy with white sides and a narrow black sub-terminal band. It has a conspicuous crest of down-curved feathers, and conspicuous yellow eyes. The wings are thick and short, and the tail is long and rounded. The immature bird is similar, but lacks the face markings and the crest. The young birds have a dark-brown to grey back with brown barring, and have bright lemon-yellow cheeks. Distribution and habitat The white-fronted jay is endemic to Brazil. Its range extends from Rio de Janeiro in the south to Minas Gerais in the west and south, and Espírito Santo in the east. Its typical habitat is undisturbed mixed forest, although it is tolerant of degraded forests. Behaviour The white-fronted jay eats fruit, berries and seeds, which it picks from the ground or from low and medium-sized trees. It is a quiet species and often forages alone or in pairs. It nests in tree holes or natural cavities, building a stick nest from twigs and grasses. It lays three to six creamy-white eggs, and the clutch is incubated for 14 to 15 days. The chicks fledge after about another 14 to 15 days 2d92ce491b
