Managing Anxiety in the Workplace This is a follow-up post to a recent Psychology Today blog post by psychologist Dr. David Mehl-Madrona that makes some important points regarding the current state of anxiety in the workplace. Anxiety in the workplace is not new. There are several reasons why anxiety comes up in the workplace. One is a fear of failure. Many people are afraid to fail. Another reason is the pressure to perform in the workplace. Most people feel more pressure to perform well at work than they do at school. They want to meet the expectations of their bosses and co-workers. Yet another reason is the promotion process. Many people don't do as well on the big tests as they do on their college examinations, especially if they haven't done well in school. Anxiety is a feeling, so it can be controlled, controlled, controlled. It can be managed. How? Some things to consider are: 1. Be realistic about expectations.
