This review will discuss the associations between sexual orientation, gender identity and perinatal neuroendocrine patterns. The review is based primarily on the perinatal endocrine patterns of male sexual orientation, but many of the associations with female sexual orientation will be shown. The perinatal neuroendocrine environment (fetus, placenta, baby and maternal plasma) affects the mother-to-infant hormonal communication and is likely to alter sexual orientation and gender identity of the fetus. These hormones (insulin, leptin, estradiol and oxytocin) are associated with the dopaminergic, serotonergic, and oxytocinergic system, and the production of testosterone (testosterone, estradiol ba244e880a
