The long-term objective of this grant is to understand the genetics, biochemistry, physiology and pathology of T cell development. Two specific goals of this grant are 1) to investigate the biochemistry and genetics of human T cell development and 2) to identify genes required for human T cell development. For specific aim 1 we have previously used fusions between developing T cells and a T cell hybrid which has the normal chromosome number but contains an extra marker chromosome for 2H9, and we have identified and mapped the two genes responsible for T cell development. These genes are RAG2 and ZAP70. We will use newly developed methodologies to clone both genes. Our specific aim for human T cell development is to identify mutations in these two genes which are responsible for a variety of primary immunodeficiencies, especially severe combined immunodeficiencies (SCID), which are associated with T cell development. Using a large population of patients with a variety of T cell defects we will identify these mutations and elucidate the role of these genes in human T cell development. For specific aim 2 we are attempting to use the techniques we have already established to develop a primary culture system for T cell development which will allow us to develop a DNA-based method to screen for mutations which are responsible for T cell defects. In addition, we will develop a primary culture system for the study of early hematopoietic cells which will allow us to study the earliest stages of T cell development. This system will also allow us to study the physiologic effects of T cell activation. The final specific aim is to use the techniques we have developed to try to identify the genes required for the development of B cells and platelets. These genes will help us understand the complex genetics of immune system development and may help identify defects in B cell development that lead to immune system defects.// Copyright 2018 The Go Authors.
