Rats were trained to avoid 1% sucrose solution as a conditioned stimulus in a conditioned taste aversion procedure. Water was substituted for the 1% sucrose solution as a test solution, and a 0.01% menthol solution was substituted for the sucrose solution as an aversive conditioning stimulus. The test solutions of water and 0.01% menthol were each associated with an injection of lithium chloride (LiCl, 0.9 M, 0.1 ml) in Experiment I, and the test solution of 0.01% menthol was each associated with an injection of LiCl (0.9 M, 0.1 ml) or saline (0.9 M, 0.1 ml) in Experiment II. When the same conditioning procedure was used but only 0.01% menthol solution was used as a test solution, the rats showed conditioned taste aversion to both the test solution and the conditioning stimulus (i.e., menthol). The results are consistent with the hypothesis that the lithium chloride produces its aversive effect by stimulating type III taste receptors which are closely related to the menthol receptors.Q: Using jquery with out targetting div Can i use jquery in a page which has no div or classes associated to it? For example in my java script page, if i have a div with id=main, i can use $(main) to get all the div's inside main. This is what i want to do, in a page in which i have no div or classes associated to it. how can i do this? A: Yes, it is possible. You just have to be a bit creative with how you do it. The simplest way would be to use the global $ function. $('*').click(function(){ // your code here }); The jQuery function will walk through every element on the page and perform whatever code you write in the click function. If you wanted to make things a bit more specific, you could do something like this: $('[id^=main]').click(function(){ // your code here }); This should target every element that has an id that starts with main.
