their data to the courts. Abuse of a cop by a stalker is a serious crime deserving of the maximum penalty, but in this case, Ainae was found not guilty of stalking the cop and of possessing a cellphone when arrested. So while the cop might not like that a citizen of the country is having a picnic in their front yard, it certainly wasn't deserving of stalking charges. Not to mention the cop charged him with resisting arrest and child endangerment. Someone who gets off his ass and is actually taking action against a problem in society will fare much better than someone who is also taking action against problems in society, but isn't doing enough to enact lasting change. So while the cop might not like that a citizen of the country is having a picnic in their front yard, it certainly wasn't deserving of stalking charges. Because people say things like that, I feel compelled to point out that "taking action against a problem in society" is not a value judgement. I'm fully in favour of taking action against a problem in society, and I'm only saying that because he took action against a problem in society, that doesn't give him the right to claim that he was not discriminated against. You're telling me that it's all right to criticize those who take action, but not to criticize the people taking action who are discriminated against? Pretending like the law doesn't apply to you is not exactly the same thing as consenting to the law's application to you, especially when you're not 100% of the way there yet. I can say "I think you're a stupid person" with a smile on my face or I can point it out in an unlaughable manner. I don't think I'm evil just because I do the latter, just because I criticize it. In any case, I can't see the relevance, since the cop was not condemning him for being gay, just saying that people who are trespassing in your yard are there to harass you, but the law is indifferent to who is doing what to whom. So while the cop might not like that a citizen of the country is having a picnic in their front yard, it certainly wasn't deserving of stalking charges. Because people say things like that, I feel compelled to point out that "taking action against a problem in society" is not a value judgement. I'm fully in favour of taking action against a problem in society.
