(a) Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a system for fitting welding torches to vehicle tires. (b) Description of the Prior Art In general, when different components of vehicle bodies are assembled, tires are applied to the vehicle bodies in order to accommodate the wheels of the vehicle bodies. In this case, before the tires are applied to the vehicle bodies, the tires should be fitted with welding torches, the welding torches being necessary for welding the component surfaces of the vehicle bodies. The fitting of the welding torches to the tires usually consists of a step of applying an adhesive to one of the surfaces of the tires and of a step of holding the surfaces of the tires by a fork of a robot. In the step of applying the adhesive to the surfaces of the tires, a nozzle is mounted onto the robot to selectively spray an adhesive from the nozzle. However, this is disadvantageous in that it requires a large construction space and the number of works is increased. In the step of holding the surfaces of the tires by the fork of the robot, the robot is moved to and fro above the tires and the nozzle is moved to the surface of the tire, i.e., the mounting direction of the nozzle is in a vertical direction. Therefore, it is necessary to move the fork at a high speed in synchronism with the movement of the nozzle. However, since the fork is driven by a servo motor, the driving torque of the servo motor must be large, but the loading of the tire is not large. Furthermore, 3e33713323
