The policy proposal has garnered the support of dozens of unions, civil liberties and immigrant advocacy groups. Hundreds of supporters of California's new sanctuary state law converged outside the state Capitol on Friday to decry President Donald Trump's attempt to push for its repeal, and to push their state lawmakers to support the measure. Carrying signs reading "We will not be erased" and "We are family, not a crime," demonstrators hailed California's new law designed to safeguard the public from law enforcement officials who fail to honor state and federal immigration protections. But they were also voicing outrage at Trump's assertion that California's laws have made it a haven for criminals. The new law, which takes effect Jan. 1, will prohibit local and state law enforcement officers from inquiring about a person's immigration status when there is no reason to suspect they are in the country illegally. Additionally, agencies that question people about their immigration status would have to notify federal officials if the individuals are later detained or convicted of a crime. California Gov. Gavin Newsom, who signed the bill into law in September, called the federal government's message that the Golden State has become a lawless place "nonsense" and "factually untrue." "These are facts, these are legitimate law enforcement concerns," Newsom said. "And they're going to be enforced and respected by the people of this state." Democrats on Capitol Hill have expressed support for California's new sanctuary law as well. A group of Democratic members of the House Judiciary Committee on Thursday wrote a letter to federal authorities in the U.S. Department of Justice and the U.S. Department of Homeland
