Adobe Photoshop 2022 (Version 23.0) [2022]

A two-day strike by some of Kenya's top sugar producers has been disrupted by a violent demonstration in the capital, Nairobi. Singing and chanting, around 2,000 demonstrators armed with sticks, petrol bombs and home-made guns marched through Nairobi streets on Tuesday and broke through police barricades. They dispersed only after shots were fired warning them to stay out of a central district. Police said the demonstration was organised by the Kenya Sugar Millers Association (Kesama) with the aim of disrupting Tuesday's auction of sugar in Nairobi. The union said the cut in production was justified because sugar prices in the international market were higher than in Kenya. The auction of 44,000 tonnes of sugar was disrupted last month when the sugar millers blocked major roads leading to the port in Mombasa for a day. A few weeks later Kesama boss Joseph Kuria was locked in a fight with police at the port in Mombasa after his union said he was assaulted by security personnel. This left six officers injured as a crowd gathered to support the union. The new dispute centres on the fact that sugar mills are not allowed to sell to domestic buyers - a provision designed to prevent price fixing by cartels. The millers say this is unfair because they are forced to sell to domestic buyers at the international price, whereas the sugar traders are allowed to buy at the local price. The government is discussing whether to set a maximum price for sugar in the domestic market to end the standoff but details are still being worked out. The department of agriculture said this year's harvest will be a record 17.9 million tonnes. It will have a positive impact on the price, as cheaper supplies mean the price of the two big export markets, India and China, will rise further. Authorities said in 2012-2013 the country exported a record 23.4 million tonnes. The country's sugar, tea, coffee and cacao industries are among the most important sources of income in the east African nation.
