CASE HISTORY/CLINICAL PRESENTATION: The 60-year-old woman presents to the clinic with increasing abdominal pain and distension. Upon examination, the patient is found to be in moderate distress and the exam reveals significant gastric erythema, indicating a diagnosis of peptic ulcer. As the team discusses her situation, it becomes apparent that the patient has a very small prostate and possible erectile dysfunction. The woman is sexually active and given the size of the prostate, would unlikely ever be able to be a father. Is this ethically acceptable? Working through the case scenario in the context of professional nursing and clinical ethics, we explored how unstructured data, including the family history, BMI, and prostate size, can be useful tools to identify patient preferences, and offer clinical support that promotes care and addresses fears and worries./* * Mesa 3-D graphics library * * Copyright (C) 2009 VMware, Inc.
