February 4, 2019

â€” A strong introduction piques your reader's curiosity, provides background information on your topic, and presents a clear thesis statement. This is a good way to start a compelling essay or even a newspaper editorial. At the beginning of a note or article, be sure to use an introductory sentence (for example, "We want to talk about ...", "In this article we want to talk about ...") to provide the reader with information that allows him to formulate and formulate what is about what he needs to say in the text. Here is an example of the beginning of an introductory part of an article on health development: "We want to talk about how..."
