Why does US-style medical practice change patients? Why does US-style medical practice change patients? It is widely acknowledged that the United States (US) “medical system” is considered the model of the world for healthcare. To many across the globe, we are the standard by which all other healthcare systems are measured. Why do I see most general practices in Australia and New Zealand (the UK also) exhibit a US-style medical practice? Because our healthcare systems are still catering to a population of older patients and “baby boomers”. It is only recently that we are starting to see change in the structure of practice as a result of the aging of our population. Why does there seem to be such a stark difference between the US and Australia? What is happening here? The figure below provides a graphic illustration of the healthcare structure between the US and Australia and New Zealand. As you can see, the US has a population of 27.4 million persons over 65, and these numbers continue to grow. In Australia and New Zealand, this figure is 5.7 million, and this is projected to grow to 8.7 million in 2030. If you look at the top of the graph, you will note that the two lines cross in about 2012, and the trend as of 2014 is essentially the same. In short, this is starting to push the Australian/NZ system into a more US-style medical practice, and there is plenty more growth over the next decade. The graph shows the number of people aged 65 or older (overall), and the number aged 65 or older who are Medicare beneficiaries, (also overall). The US has a much higher proportion of elderly, as indicated by the gray area on the graph. The US also has a much higher proportion of elderly Medicare beneficiaries compared to Australia/NZ as indicated by the dark blue area on the graph. The dark blue area also represents a higher proportion of the whole aged population, 3e33713323
