The article here states that the Asteroid Belt is as wide as Jupiter, and only the asteroid belt between Mars and Jupiter is in-between. If Jupiter is 5.2x1030kg, and the belt is 6x1029kg That's only 2.4% density, and I don't see why it's so small. Shouldn't the density of the belt be as big as the star itself? It's a bit hard to believe. A: There are many definitions of the term "asteroid belt." One definition that can be found in NASA's Astronomy Glossary is The region of space between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter (the asteroid belt) I don't know if this is the same as the way the term "asteroid belt" is used in popular culture. In that context, I would define the Asteroid Belt to be the belt of asteroids between Mars and Jupiter. Mars is 5% the density of Earth, so a belt with the density of Mars would have a mass of 0.5% of the mass of Earth. Jupiter has a mass of 0.15% of the mass of Earth. Earth has a radius of 6371 km, and a density of 5.515x1022 kg/m3. This means that the density of Earth's asteroid belt is $880.0009\frac{1}{m^3}$ (5.515)
