Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a transformer, and more particularly, to a light emitting diode lighting transformer for use in a lamp tube. 2. Description of the Prior Art A typical transformer has a winding design constituted of a plurality of coils. When an AC input is provided to the transformer, a secondary winding winding is produced, wherein a plurality of coils are interwound with each other. Accordingly, a magnetic field is induced by the AC input and is used to transfer the power. The transformer may be used in many electronic devices, such as a charger and a power supply. In an electronic device, for example, a power supply is used to provide the electronic device with power. Generally, each coil of a transformer has a rectangular cross-section with a length, a width and a thickness. When a voltage is applied to each coil, a magnetic field is induced and is produced, thus affecting the operation efficiency and operation characteristic of the transformer. For example, when the magnetic field is not properly induced, the power efficiency is greatly affected.
