I created a program that open a JFrame. The main frame is a log in window and is successful. Then when the user enters their username and password into the edit boxes on the login window the program is suppose to connect to a database to verify their username and password. The problem is I can't get the value of the edit boxes to be sent to the class that will verify their username and password. The function is in the class called db_check and when I try to print out the info it just shows the object and doesn't return the value of the edit boxes. I was thinking of just removing the log in JFrame and creating a JFrame for every class. I'm using Netbeans as my IDE. enter image description here enter image description here enter image description here enter image description here enter image description here enter image description here A: First thing first. You must not add new questions in the same thread, as this is considered as "question-spam". Now, about your question. I was thinking of just removing the log in JFrame and creating a JFrame for every class. Don't think it's a good idea. You can't remove a JFrame completely, because it's the main component of the application. You can hide/show it by using a JFrame#setVisible(boolean). The only way to see what's inside a JFrame is by creating a listener. in this case a JFrame#addWindowListener(WindowListener) for the JFrame's "close" action. But don't forget that you must also implement the WindowListener interface, by adding it as an inner class in the class you want to listen. Here's an example of a class that has two JFrames, one of them invisible, so that you can see what's inside. I removed the functionality 4bc0debe42
