New biological test methods to detect food allergens. The standardization of food allergens and biomarkers of food allergy is of great importance for the characterization and standardization of food products. In the last few years the pathophysiology of food allergy has been investigated thoroughly. The identification and characterisation of major and minor allergenic proteins are extremely important steps. The improvement in bioanalytical tools and in measurement methods has greatly increased our knowledge of the allergenic source of food. Specifically, the evolution of the principles of detection of food allergens from protein to peptide to DNA has been developed in the last twenty years. These improvements have also led to the development of new biological methods for biomarkers and food allergens detection. Food allergy is a growing problem, affecting 2-3% of the European population. The prevalence is even higher in the paediatric and adult population. Despite the fact that food allergy affects all socioeconomic categories, it is more frequent in rural regions. The increasing incidence of food allergy is associated with the increased consumption of some food ingredients, the possible role of genetically modified organisms and the recent changes in the food industry. Present-day methods to detect food allergens are laboratory-based. Molecular techniques allow for the identification and the characterization of the major food allergens. Sensitive and specific methods are required to identify food allergens so that the manufacturers can eliminate these allergens from the food and to avoid risk of severe reactions in consumers.
