Pluto's lower atmosphere is often (erroneously) described as gassy, but it actually contains more ices than Earth's atmosphere does, which is why Pluto's surface temperatures are not that different from Earth's. The hydrogen and nitrogen is in the form of methane, which is the third most abundant gas in the Solar System. Like ammonia, methane doesn't just diffuse through the atmosphere, but can be ablated from the surface by solar radiation. It's estimated that two-thirds of the methane on Pluto (a body 1.7% the mass of Earth) is supplied by the solar wind (the stream of charged particles that surround the Sun). Methane is extremely volatile, meaning that it can evaporate very easily. Pluto's surface is coated with many large impact craters and a thick layer of (mostly) ices. When the methane rises above the impact craters, it becomes volatile and then evaporates. Methane is a greenhouse gas and the entire atmosphere heats up, but only once it reaches the atmosphere's surface temperature. On Earth, this happens at an average surface temperature of around -70°C . On Pluto, it's -280°C . Therefore, as the atmosphere warms, more and more of the methane evaporates. In the process of evaporating, it's lost to space and the local gravity of the planet will pull it away. The Solar System's other gas giants (Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus, and Neptune) lose methane to space in larger quantities than Pluto does. Saturn is losing about 0.02 Earth's atmosphere per year, Neptune 0.01. Uranus loses about 0.2 Earth's atmosphere, which is a lot, but it's not huge in planetary terms and therefore it's not a priority. The only
