A: It is a keyboard script for Windows 7. You can safely delete it. It is not supported by Microsoft. The controversy over how often to show school kids explicit, violent video games has been going on for years, but it's intensified recently as legislators and advocates for children have argued about whether it is fair to hold them liable for their actions. That controversy came to a head Tuesday with a federal judge's ruling that California laws requiring game developers to pay a $1,000 fine for marketing games to children are unconstitutional. The decision overrides a California law designed to restrict the sale of violent video games to minors. The law is called the Interactive Digital Software Promotion Act. The state was trying to impose the fine on American developers, but Judge Haywood Gilliam ruled on Tuesday that the law violates due process and other constitutional protections for free speech. "The free speech claim is based on the idea that the statute places too much discretion in the hands of the government to regulate speech, and that it is all-powerful," Gilliam wrote. The government's interest in restricting game sales to children, a particularly vulnerable group, was well-established by 2009, he wrote. The California law includes requirements that games be rated by the ESRB or PEGI or both, that they have a clear warning label on the box and contain an option to disable the violent or sexually explicit content.

Gilliam's ruling came in a lawsuit filed by several game companies against the attorney general of California. The companies included Electronic Arts, publisher of the Madden NFL series; Take-Two Interactive Software, maker of the NBA

2K series and developer of the Mafia series; and Ziff Davis, publisher of GamesRadar and GameZone. The companies claim the law is unconstitutional because it forces them to fund the ESRB and PEGI and that the ratings system is flawed because some video games do not receive ratings. California officials say games are one of the top three influences on children's behavior and are a big problem. "Kids playing video games are a major social problem, especially for kids as young as 8 or 9 who play these really violent games," said California Attorney General Kamala Harris. "We're working to stop the Internet and video-game companies from making these games available to kids." The attorney general says the games in question "present realistic and graphic depictions of animal slaughter, assault, rape,
