This macro expands to a string literal without the quotes that I specified: #define STR(x) #x char *str = STR(foo); The macro expands to: char *str = foo; Why? A: As @Wolfgang says, you're just missing a concatenation operator: #define STR(x) #x char *str = STR(foo); should be #define STR(x) #x char *str = STR(foo) A: You need to concatenate the # to the macro parameter, like: #define STR(x) #x char *str = STR(foo); Macros are processed as text, and text concatenation happens before expansion of the macro, and concatenation needs to be done via an operator. See: A: You have to concatenate the macro to the parameter. #define STR(x) #x #define STR(x) STR(x) char *str = STR(foo); FRENCH RECONNAISSANCE - France is once again taking the lead in the European missile defense industry, but its situation is a bit more precarious than when France and the United States worked together to build their own missile-shield systems. France plans to modify its existing European Phalanx system with a larger laser-targeting pod to better engage low-flying cruise missiles that can evade radar. The current system, developed and built by Israel's Rafael Advanced Defense Systems, is effective, but not perfect. Rafael's system remains classified, and no information has been released about how it works, but officials say it could use more power. The French program will be based on the version sold to Italy, but with a 2.8-meter-wide pod and the ability to point it skyward. The other step is to increase the number of ships from three to five to support the program. The French navy is not happy with the program. It wants more money and equipment, but is being kept in the dark about the new French system. France has been more relaxed in the past in open communication with the European Union about its defense plans, and
