Wet Creek Trail The Wet Creek Trail is a hiking trail in the Mount Washington Valley, in New Hampshire. The trail is about 2.5 miles (3.9 km) long and follows the tributary Wet Creek for a short distance. Description The trail ascends sharply from the parking lot of the Wet Creek Campground and climbs through a small village at the top of the mountain along a steep ridge. At the top of the ridge is a wooden observation platform, from which the view stretches to the west to the mountains of West Virginia. Most of the trail is shaded by thick mountain laurel trees. The first half mile of the trail is particularly scenic. The trail descends back down to the village at the top of the mountain and eventually reaches the base of the summit tower. The west summit tower is only 15 feet high, but it offers a view of the whole valley. From the top, the trail descends a short section to the west, then continues straight up a ridge to the summit. Trail and summit The Wet Creek Trail runs along most of the south side of Wet Mountain. The trail starts on the southeast side of the Wet Mountain parking lot. It runs along the ridge of the mountain for several hundred feet before taking a sharp left and climbing the ridge. The trail continues to run on the ridge for about half a mile before turning northeast, descending a few hundred feet to the Wet Creek Campground. The campground is about a mile from the summit. The summit (also called Maple Mountain) is covered in mature trees, which is unusual in the high elevation terrain of the Mount Washington Valley. The top of the summit is home to the Mount Washington Observatory and the main refuge building. The top of the summit is also home to a series of radio towers, including a 20-turbine wind turbine (Wet Mountain Wind Farm) and antenna towers. The summit tower is the highest point in the valley and is about above the valley floor. It is also the highest radio frequency tower in the United States. Foot of the summit tower is the historic telecommunication relay tower, one of three that make up the Mount Washington Summit Station (MWSS). This tower provides for communications between the various towers on the summit of Mount Washington. It is the highest point in the United States where radio communications are possible from a single point. See also List of New Hampshire state
