The invention more particularly relates to such apparatus which provides the required wear resistant coating on the interior of a pipe which is supported on a concrete slab. The invention is not limited to the coating of pipes but may be advantageously employed for the coating of a variety of other elongate members. Pipes for transporting fluid are formed in a variety of sizes and configurations. One particular application, which is of concern to the present invention, is the use of a pipe which transports petroleum products through a concrete slab which is used as a floor. Such pipes are commonly formed from polyethylene which provides an excellent insulating and protecting medium for the fluids being carried by the pipe. However, because the polyethylene is not wear resistant, it will eventually wear due to abrasion from the concrete floor. The abrasion of the pipe, particularly on its interior surface, causes a reduction in the pipe diameter and a consequent reduction in the fluid-carrying capacity of the pipe. Additionally, the wear of the pipe may cause cracks in the polyethylene which may adversely affect the fluids being carried by the pipe. Therefore, it would be advantageous to have an apparatus for providing a wear resistant coating on the interior
