Note The program's power comes from its ability to assemble a multi-layered image, rather than merely manipulating a single layer of a photo. In Chapter 1, you learned how to rearrange layers by drag and drop. For more information, see Chapter 6. 5. **In the top-left panel, click the Layers button to create a new empty layer**. The first new layer you create is called the background layer, and it's blank. You create the next layer on top of the background layer.

Spring Singleton defaults that are runtime properties (some of which are good defaults, too) for example `ConnectionFactory`, `DataSource`,...

These are really only appropriate where you are replacing/overriding the default and can supply a better implementation. Configuration isn't the first/best place to override/replace the default because you are supposed to be able to cope if you see it fail (i.e. by not being able to instantiate it, reading bad values etc). Then spring has a bit of a dependency on the annotation-configured approach (`spring.bean.name`, `spring.datasource.name`,...) not being used. So any location where you have this is best in a different bean file. But the good thing is that it works whether the JVM autowires singletons or not, unless you specify a different bean name (you don't need to, unless you already are specifying one) - and if you don't, you should have no problem! If you see duplicate bean definitions you can either end the propagation (`spring.jpa.properties.hibernate.show_sql`) - which will suppress the definition from being created but it may not be suitable, depending on the bean - or you can specify the particular bean to match the duplicate and the container will essentially ignore the duplicate definition. But then you really need to be sure that they aren't being autowired. And perhaps you want an interceptor/other extension applied, so if you want the service to be injected you should use something like This is then a good way to be sure that the database datasource is always used and to inject the service within it. I have seen some developers use the same approach but use a field to store the reference to the datasource, rather than the DI container - but I still don't agree with this approach, as the datasource can often be replaced by an instance of DataSource (and now you can't do that because you have

---
