With players trying to make the league with the healthiest bodies possible and multiple professional football athletes battling cancer, the current crop of NFL players are much more aware than ever before of the benefits of medical marijuana. Marijuana is an herbaceous flowering plant known for its psychoactive effects, including euphoria and the munchies. As more and more states legalize cannabis for recreational purposes, the NFL is also taking a closer look at how cannabis could be an effective treatment for players suffering from pain, insomnia, and an array of other ailments. On Monday, Denver Broncos quarterback Case Keenum told the Denver Post that he uses cannabis to help manage his pain during the season and to help him focus on football. He admitted that he was given advice from a variety of sources before making the decision to put cannabis in his system. With the league itself giving no clear indication that they are going to adopt a policy against cannabis, it seems as though players, coaches, and front office personnel will be at the forefront of finding out how best to make medical marijuana available to athletes on a widespread basis. Ultimately, if the NFL does decide to take action against cannabis, one can only hope that the organization's decision is not based on politics and race. 270 So.2d 120 (1972) William A. NELSON v.
