Generally, such a brake booster boosts (increases) a force applied to brake pedal and assists the driver's braking operation. By this, a burden on the driver's hand is decreased and a less powerful braking operation can be carried out. Patent Document 1 discloses an example of a brake booster. The brake booster includes a valve body including a valve chamber, a diaphragm disposed in the valve chamber, and a valve mechanism for controlling an opening of a communication hole. The valve mechanism includes a rod disposed in the valve chamber, a roller linked to the rod, and a latch mechanism for holding the roller to an opposite wall of the valve chamber. When the brake booster operates, the valve mechanism moves toward the diaphragm and the opening of the communication hole is increased. This causes a negative pressure in an intake chamber to be applied to the valve chamber so as to charge a fluid into the intake chamber from an external pressure source. Accordingly, as the negative pressure in the intake chamber is increased, a negative pressure in the diaphragm chamber is increased and a force to be applied to the rod by the diaphragm is increased.
