Asking for change in our under-resourced schools The following statement was made on 31 October at a panel discussion on our under-resourced schools. Question: What is really causing the under-performance of our under-resourced schools, and what can we do to change that? Response: We have all had moments when we have questioned whether our schools are the right place for us, our children. We can also question whether our teachers are equipped to teach our children to be well-rounded learners, both academically and personally. In recent years, there has been an increased sense of division in our classrooms and in our school buildings. For a number of reasons, including teachers and staff turnover, we often need to make changes to the physical infrastructure of our school before we can create a conducive environment for learning. Over the past few years, the work we have done to remove asbestos from our schools has received a lot of media attention. The work is expensive and complex. It has taken a lot of hard work and our support from some wonderful schools to achieve. Many of our under-resourced schools still do not have fit-out plans, particularly in relation to facilities such as toilets and washrooms, teaching areas and play areas. Both the State Government and school communities would benefit from our being given the correct resource to develop fit-out plans. Our under-resourced schools have also received less government funding than schools with similar deprivation indices. It is clear that we need to do more for our schools. We need to have a wide-ranging conversation about how we can better organise ourselves to provide services that are needed in our schools. We need to look more creatively at ways of
