================================ Allows the user to create a single keystroke macro to be triggered at any time. Most people are familiar with Microsoft's AutoIt. AutoIt is an easy to use program that allows the user to create scripts that automate repetitive tasks. It allows for a GUI to be created in a variety of ways with the aid of text boxes, buttons, and checkboxes. It is also very easy to use, and the language is easy to learn. However, AutoIt is not as fast as a C-based program, and if you want to go farther, AutoIt cannot do much more than just play a sound file and react to things like hotkeys. Most computer users may not know this, but many common tasks on a PC can be accomplished by creating a script using AutoIt. These scripts can be run on a regular basis or on-demand. If you are in a hurry to perform a task that would normally take you several hours, you can have a shortcut to a script ready to run in a matter of minutes. Scripts created with AutoIt can be made to run in the background, which allows the user to access their computer without having to interact with the script. In this way, you can have a script that adds a new folder to the taskbar without having to unlock the user interface. In this guide, we will be creating a script that will take a picture of a person in front of the computer and save it as a.jpg file. It can then be displayed with PhotoScape. This can be a very useful tool when you are creating a business or family photo album with your new computer, or if you are storing and printing your pictures in your home, to be viewed on your portable device or even a larger display. If you would like to use an external tool, you will have to enter the directory of the script and the file extension you would like to use for your files.
