All this is more alarming when we find that there are numbers of people around us who are leaving their message through QRL. So if you know someone who is suffering from over load of QRL messages, do help him/her Tapping into the smartphone world, we will bring you QR Codes, a new way of coding and decoding information. Mostly used in Japan and China, this new technology includes a little history, a little science and some terms. Here is what you need to know about QR Codes QR codes can be found on everything from billboards to clothing, but they can also be found on gadgets and appliances. In fact, QR codes can be found on the back of McDonald's McRib sandwich, the jumbos in the restaurant, on the box of Pillsbury French Bread, on the labels of the Happy Meal toys, on the burger buns of the McNuggets and, of course, on the packaging of many soft drink. The QR code is the standard for mobile tagging and communicating. This code is only capable of displaying one type of information. The barcode is only capable of containing specific information, like product identification and pricing. This restricts what a QR code can do for the end user. If you took a picture of a QR code, it would be useless, or at least not usable. There's too much information in there that's not useful for you. The advantage of QR codes is that they can decode any message, no matter how compact the coding language is. They do not limit you to the size of the information, unlike a barcode, a text message or a URL. QR codes are automatic and can be used on your phone as well as on other screens.
