In this tutorial, we will learn to use Photoshop CS5 to create a cartoon-style character, from scratch, in about six hours. Creating a Raster-Based Artwork We will create our cartoon character from scratch using the Pen Tool, and we will use layers and opacity in Photoshop for its effects. There are several tutorials on the Internet that teach how to create a cartoon using Photoshop. We have created our own character from scratch, but we have used these tutorials as a guide to create our character, which we created in this tutorial. This video tutorial explains how to create a cartoon character from scratch, using Photoshop. The main difference between our character and all the cartoon tutorials is that we have used a raster-based editing system, and we have used Photoshop's smart layers with layer-based editing. A raster-based system will retain its fine detail for printing. Using layers means that we can manipulate the effects of other layers through transparency, so that it's really only the effects that affect the art itself. We will create our character from scratch, using layers and opacity in Photoshop for its effects. Step 1: Creating the Background To begin, create a new document with 1072 x 1024 pixels. In the new document, we'll start with the background. We will create a solid-color background, which gives us our character its basic shape. Step 2: Using the Pen Tool to Draw the Character With the Pen Tool, we will draw the outline of the character we are about to create. Step 3: Making Changes to the Line Art The Pen Tool can do more than outline basic shapes; it can also adjust the width of its line. We will make the pencil thinner by pressing and releasing the right mouse button. Step 4: Adding the Drop Shadow Effect We can quickly add the drop shadow effect to our character by using the Fx button, or the Effects Options, as shown here: We will place this in the upper-left corner of the image, roughly above the eyebrows. The settings we will use for the drop shadow will be Desaturate and 18 px from the top. Step 5: Creating the Glow and the Speckles Next, we will create the glow effect, by applying a gradient, that will begin at the top of the character. We will create a

Letter of the Day: The True Cost of Hypocrisy As the self-righteous Left descend upon Washington this weekend for a post-Inaugural Anti-Trump riot, we wonder if the out-of-touch elites who have caused all this economic misery also plan to sell out the poor once the storm passes. Because if they don't, they'll be joining the Big Out-of-Work-and-Living-in-Renting-Apartments America of the National Archives. The National Archives occupies a 475,000-square-foot former warehouse in northwest Washington that has an honor's guard of dashing CIA officers, a presidential helicopter pad and ornate private lounges for press briefings. But despite its proximity to the new president and to the White House Correspondents' Association (WHCA), it's been trapped in a rut of over-classification and hostility to the press ever since President Bill Clinton ordered the feds to turn it over to the National Archives. More than 1,500 years of history is stored there. But so much of it is classified that less than a quarter of the estimated 50 million pages in the Archives, dating from 1609 to 1963, are available to the public or to researchers. The Archives didn't have the kind of crowd control it needs to save taxpayer dollars on a so-called White House tour. Visitors endured Cold War era signs warning against "breaking locks" and "fingerprinting" suspects. A sign at the entrance to a room containing George Washington's handkerchiefs read, "Please lock all doors when leaving." An archivist spotted a visitor sneaking a peek at something on a table. "The gentleman was caught," the staffer told a reporter. "He was very embarrassed and escorted out." But the biggest surprise was the $28,000 cost of security for the new president and first family. Bill Clinton's wife, Hillary, got to skip the expense and hassle. Not that she seems to like to be bothered. Last week, Hillary fumed that she and former president Barack Obama weren't the only victims of the "birther" conspiracy. Hillary cited the "birtherism" to justify the Obama administration's leaking details of a White House counsel meeting
