Biophotonics is the science of using light to manipulate living organisms for the control of their behavior. Biophotonics can lead to new technologies, such as the biotechnology of biomedical lasers, and the potential to provide an entirely new level of understanding of how living organisms function, for the betterment of healthcare and the environment. This course gives students a good basic understanding of the use of photons for manipulating bio-molecules. Students are first introduced to the fundamental tools of Quantum Physics that underpin the ability of this field to manipulate life. Students are introduced to the operation and properties of silicon integrated photon sources, and the principles of light detection, including the broad range of detectors that have been developed for bio-photonics. As Bio-photonics is a relatively new field the emphasis is placed on the practical aspects and the development of the skills to deal with the associated challenges. Course content includes: The basic operation of light in quantum physics Quantum optics and interference Fundamental properties of photons Introduction to photonic devices Generalised sources Detection All of this is underpinned by a background in Physics and chemistry. The course is designed to introduce a problem solving attitude to a variety of research problems, and in particular to enable a student to solve their
