Selecting and editing with layers Layers are the backbone of Photoshop. _Layers_, or _depth_, refer to the illusion of depth in an image. Because you can see through layers on a document, you need to make changes in layers to see the effects in the finished product. The layers are like transparent newspapers, each stacked on top of the other. So many different layers enable you to easily insert and delete layers. You can insert and delete multiple layers at one time. If you make a change on one layer, Photoshop makes all the changes occur at the same time. You can create a new layer, which is like a blank new page in a newspaper, or you can duplicate or copy layers from another image. When you use the duplicate or copy feature, Photoshop creates a new layer based on the original layer. You can also resize, rotate, crop, or filter an image. When you do these things, it affects all the layers within a Photoshop document. Any layers that are locked cannot be edited or changed until you unlock the layer. You can choose to lock layers so that you don't inadvertently change the layers below the locked layer. To lock a layer, drag its green lock symbol to the layer above it (refer to Figure 5-6). If you are working with a complex image, you will find that the addition of layers provides you with a quick way to enhance the image. The process of working with layers in Photoshop is as follows: 1. Create a new file in Photoshop. If you want to use existing images, convert them to the.psd (Photoshop Design) file type. In this book, I use.jpeg or.jpg images only for the exercises. You can use other file types in your own work. 2. Add a layer and edit it. You can create a new layer and add layers to a new document. You can duplicate a layer to create an exact duplicate or copy of the original layer. You can also use the copy function to make another layer based on the one and other stuff for positive living Main menu Post navigation 10 ways to live for the reason… I'm not going to tell you what it is, and why you should do it. I'm going to tell you why you shouldn't. (and, when you see me online, I'll be talking in our little party voice, about positive behaviours. You know the sort. Happy, upbeat, and wanting to make you happy and upbeat too.) So. You should be doing it? Not really. So why should you be doing it? Because you can. Because you want to. Because it can make you happy. Because you don't have to. Because you want to. That's why. Oh, and yes, it's a bit of a pick 'n' mix, isn't it? But to be blunt, I've got this list, and it's worth looking at. * I'll add to it occasionally, but currently it's things that will make you happier and healthier and more positive, not things that are trivial or silly. The thing is, I can't really imagine life without them. I love the idea of being genuinely happy, because I'm a person who can be happy for a while. But I'm also a person who can be miserable for a long time. I struggle to keep it under control, and am generally miserable about most things. And I know that my other aspects of life aren't just as bad. So being happy is a nice state to be in, while it lasts. And I want to be happy. Not just the happy part of the equation. I want to be genuinely happy. I want to get to the point where I'm not just, 'ugh, I'm so angry, I don't know why'. I want to be able to enjoy myself (if that makes sense?). Because I'm not happy right now. I'm not really happy about much of anything. I'm sad, and I'm angry. I'm sort of embarrassed. I want to cry all the time.
