Q: How to speed up Time Machine backup? One of the core issues with Time Machine is that it backs up only the changed files. Unfortunately, that's almost all of them (files that were created/changed/or deleted in the past 1 year, that's most of it). I've started a backup 2 years ago. For each day, I backup 100GB, and for each month I backup 750GB. It would save me a lot of time and space if I could do this: Backup all changed files after last backup Skip all backup (except 1st backup) every week (so, 500GB + 1GB = 1GB) Store all backups and let Time Machine do incremental backups I know it's possible to have some of this done by automation, but is it possible to achieve all of it (I'm on a Mac). A: Add a column to the end of your backup sheet and check it. The column header says "When - Backup", and the Cell value is the date you put in the "When" column the previous time. A: There is actually a relatively easy solution for doing incremental backups, even to a network share, which is in a way auto-activating them. You don't need to use a separate folder or a time machine-compatible drive. What I did, and it works like a charm, is to set up an NTFS incremental backup with MacCloner. It's a light weight solution, that is fast and has clean interfaces. You can put an external firewire drive with a bunch of unallocated space, and drag and drop the compressed backups from TimeMachine from MacCloner there. They will be automatically decompressed and expanded, and then TimeMachine will start restoring them from the most recent one. You can choose to restore them in any order, but I recommend starting at the oldest. The empty external drive will act as a FireWire hard drive. It will give you about 30 GB of space for TimeMachine to expand to if it ever runs out of space in the default location. If you ever need more space, you can add a drive and keep saving to it. I never set TimeMachine to get my full backups at once. You will need to manually restart your Mac to activate the backups (Hint: Did you change anything in your backup sources?). Note: Make sure

Anyone knows a workaround? A: REGEXP is supported by MySQL since version 4.0.16 and it is not supported by Hibernate (the underlying database system). Try and change your query to "SELECT "id", "type", "name", "description", "image_path" FROM "demo"."divisions" WHERE "type" IN ( SELECT value FROM SYSFUNCS.REGEXP_SUBSTR("
