Create a Healing Garden Explore the healing aspects of plants and herbs An indoor herb garden can be a calming and beautiful place to spend time. It can also be a relief to use a space that is easy to access. Many of the healing herbs we talk about on this site are highly aromatic so can be difficult to find outside. With a great interior plant you can heal yourself and your family and friends using the freshest, most natural and most potent herbs available. Creating a healing herb garden is one of the simplest and most rewarding projects of all. It can also be highly rewarding to your family, friends and neighbours – particularly if you provide them with the real benefit of a complete, nutritious, natural, ready to eat food... your garden! Creating a Herbal Garden Several factors need to be considered when creating a healing herb garden: The type and placement of containers, how large they are and how far apart they will be. How wide your paths should be. How clean is your area and how well can you remove weeds? Where are your plants likely to get sun and what plants prefer full shade? What potting mixes are going to be suitable for each planting? Does your garden soil need a good amending? Amendments like peat, perlite or compost will increase the number of nutrients in the soil. I recommend that you create a compost or peat-based mix for your herbs and then amend with some more standard organic fertiliser like compost, organic fertiliser and high quality mulch. In this example there are three different types of container, but you can also have two or four. It is also possible to have just one type of container for herbs; this is a hardy plant called basil. This plant can be planted, grown and harvested in containers. Below is a list of plants for your garden and associated uses. You will find each plant detailed on the pages linked to from this list. Assessment of the effect of the operation of the nuclear power plant on the digestive tract diseases of Poles. The authors carried out an epidemiological study of digestive diseases of Poles who had come from the region of the installation of the nuclear power plant, since the beginning of its operation. The epidemiological study was performed in the Gdynia region in 1994. The time period from the first post-accident medical examinations and the first questionnaire surveys carried out in 1986 in the region of the installation of the nuclear power plant until the second visits and the surveys in 1994 in the region of the town of Gdynia was a mean of 12 years. The control group was made up of people from the same region who had not been affected by the operation of the nuclear power plant. The prevalence of diseases of the digestive tract in the population of the region of the operation of the nuclear power plant was higher, by 5.6%, than in the population of the control group. According to the results of the correlation analysis, the following risk factors were found to be statistically significant: low education level, a low level of consumption of cereal products, a low level of consumption of fruits and vegetables, the history of illnesses at an early age, the presence of malabsorption or hyperabsorption syndrome, no daily consumption of milk, a high body mass index, depression, being a smoker, and there being no association between the incidence of diseases of the digestive tract and the time of residence in the region of the operation of the nuclear power plant.
