Swamy alien style Researchers have devised a model to describe an "alien" species that can colonize planets. The model shows how it could evolve in various ways, depending on where it's located. The discovery of exoplanets has revitalized interest in intelligent life elsewhere in the universe. Following the discovery of exoplanets, astronomers have become increasingly interested in the formation of life on distant planets. This has led to numerous studies aimed at understanding how life and intelligence might evolve in a universe with very different resources than our own. Sociodynamics But when we search for life on other planets we have to consider more than just biology. It is possible that life on a planet might evolve through dramatically different evolutionary trajectories from our own. A recent paper explores the sociodynamics of alien evolution. Published in the journal Astrobiology, the paper explores the possible evolutionary paths of alien lifeforms based on the characteristics of their planets. Sociodynamics is a term used to describe an entire ecosystem evolving based on the interactions of individuals of the species. If you want to know more about sociodynamics, read this primer by Future Science Group. The model The authors of this study based their findings on three key factors that determine the evolution of extraterrestrial life: the composition of the atmosphere, the composition of the environment, and the strength of top-down pressure. The researchers found that these three factors determine how the intelligent lifeform will evolve, and these factors can be predicted based on planetary parameters such as mass, radius, and orbital distance. The first factor, the composition of the atmosphere, can be defined as the mass of greenhouse gas molecules in the atmosphere. NASA In Earth's atmosphere, the concentration of carbon dioxide is higher than it is in the atmospheres of most of the planets studied. Thus, we define the "alien atmosphere" as one that has a higher concentration of this gas (or equivalent mass of it). For example, if the alien atmosphere is made of methane, CO2, and
