Mentor Graphics PADS 9.5 Crack is the newest generation of Mentor Graphics .Q: Java: Creating a hashtable of already stored data If I create a hashtable with a bunch of data in it, then add more data to the hashtable later on, is there any chance this would cause problems? Basically I have a bunch of inputs and some outputs, and want to store them in a hashtable (or something else) to be able to look them up by their numbers. A: Yes, this would cause problems. The likely explanation for this is due to the fact that the hashCode of the key in the hashtable is calculated when the hashtable is created, which means that if you add something after the initial creation, this will affect the hashCode of this key, meaning that it will no longer be usable as a key for this hashtable. Try using a LinkedHashMap instead, which has a different property - it's keys (or values) are stored in order, meaning that adding or removing data after creation will not affect the keys. Thursday, September 23, 2009 It's sketch! I opened my new sketchbook this morning and realized I actually have a lot of ideas stored up and ready to draw! I am so excited to be starting the new year with new sketchbook and a new direction...one
