After that she wakes up in her mom's house. She then begins to shower and have her mom take her to work, where she was a secretary for 20 years (How about THAT story?). At the end, she goes to work with another guy and they fuck her. And so on. The problem is that you don't know what I do to get out of the dungeon, and what the guys do to get in. HINT I am making stuff up. And not only do I make up the story (it is a fictional work of fiction!), I also make it so that the viewer doesn't understand, they get to the end of the story, read it and go "WHAT THE FUCK WAS THAT ALL ABOUT?!!" At the end of the story, I make it so there is no explanation for the whole thing, and the girl in the story just goes on with her life. I didn't come up with the story myself, it came from one of the first RPG I ever played (and thus the source for the first "dungeon" that ever entered my mind, which is why I have this first dungeon in my head). I then worked on the story for years, refining it and making it more and more complex, but there wasn't any reason to make it canon, so it was never released anywhere. However, I have so many ideas for how to develop the story further, that it would become more and more interesting. It's just that my life is pretty complicated right now, and so the story will always take a backseat. To be honest, I don't know what I'm going to do, because I want to wait for a good moment to release it. But when that moment comes, I will release it, as long as the expectations of the public are fulfilled. And that will be like a full moon. I just can't decide what to release at first, and I don't want to waste my time on something that turns out to be crap. That's why I'm still in development. I want to make sure I make a really good story before releasing it, and this step is crucial. I hope that clarifies a little. Thank you for your interest in the project. Re: RJ113419 - Dungeons and Prisoners No, not in the slightest. Because it's my story. All I have to say is: not even a little bit. It's not even f
