Detection of nucleotide sequence variation in the alcohol dehydrogenase (ADH) locus of Drosophila melanogaster. A DNA probe for the ADH locus of Drosophila melanogaster was used to study the molecular basis for the gene dosage sensitivity of the ADH locus in larval development. The sequence of the ADH probe hybridizes to the ADH A locus, and other DNA fragments present in the region. A restriction fragment length polymorphism in the probe hybridization pattern detects the ADH A+ and ADH A- alleles and permits analysis of larval development in heterozygotes. Blocking the egress pathway of antibody binding to mouse erythrocytes by adsorption of IgG. Mouse erythrocytes, sensitized in a similar fashion to those used for clinical tests of immune complexes, were bound by IgG and by equine or human anti-IgG sera. The hapten carrying RBC had two protrusions emanating from its cell surface and perpendicular to the major axis of the cell. The main function of these appendages was to help anchor the antibody-hapten complexes to the cell surface. Adsorption of IgG blocked the egress of the IgG-IgG receptor complexes into the suspending medium; large complexes were retained on the cell surface. Conversely, human or equine anti-IgG serum blocked the input of IgG by aggregating the IgG through its Fab-binding sites; the IgG did not bind. These techniques allow study of the effect of antibody blockage on the input and egress of IgG-IgG receptor complexes and are helpful in the study of antibody-mediated erythrocyte destruction.
