Player Motion Capture To create the new gameplay experience and create the visceral on-field physics and movements of the 22 footballers, EA Sports takes the real-life movements of a whole football team, then applies them to the most realistic depiction of a player to date. The players perform a high intensity match, including the whole team, and FIFA 22 captures and analyzes the data in a 2.6 million-frame motion capture suit. For the first time ever, EA Sports captures the movements of all 22 real-life players in the same system. The data captured from these players is compared with new motion capture data to populate the player with custom muscle animations, creating the most realistic player animation in a video game. While the game engine was originally coded to work with two-person motion capture, the new motion capture required 22 players, as well as 11 ball-carriers, creating a unique challenge.

Dynamic Player Kinematics

To ensure natural and realistic on-field movement, the game engine developed around the key elements of player movement. Players possess dynamic and independent upper-body and lower-body animations, allowing them to bend at the hips and follow and control the ball in flight. Players can also cut and chip the ball, pivot, beat defenders, and explosively attack the goal. In addition, every player in the final game requires a unique set of animations. From small players with small hands to taller players with larger frames, each player in FIFA 22 moves in a different way, with its own combination of musculature and technique.

Motion Capture Suit

The capture suit tracks 22 players as they attempt to win a match. Players can dive, tackle, pass, shoot or sprint, enabling the player to be fully immersed in the match without being constrained by a “play-station” type controller.

Capturing Players in 'Full-Motion'

To achieve the freedom of movement that the player experiences on the field, EA's Crystal Ball engineers worked closely with the motion capture suit manufacturer to understand how the players move in real-life. A small sensor in the suit tracks the movements of the player's skeleton with astonishing accuracy, recording the precise position and speed of all the individual bones. This data is then input directly into the FIFA 22 engine, and the player can move and behave as the real-life
