The Verge Award: #The Verge has been named Best Technology Site in 2013 and Best Technology Site in 2011. In April 2013, The Verge won the Best Popular News website award at the WebAward: Tech. AppsWeLike: #An app that was specifically developed for Android users with more than two screens was selected by softpedia for being a "best app". "Best app to use your second screen" won the "apps we like" award at Google I/O 2011. About The Verge: #The Verge is the premier source for the most important tech news. We set the agenda for the general news industry because we are excited about tech. We define it as a passion. Join the massive 2+ million monthly visitors that are part of our community. The so-called "Malin-Lundqvist Effect" has been the subject of much theoretical debate in the lay press, but only one of the three papers in a new MIT-led study actually demonstrates the effect. "Some people said it was wrong," says senior author Michael Lundqvist, the Thomas D. Klemin Professor of Radiology. "Others said it was beautiful and timeless and they are right." The idea that what we look at, also determines the conclusions we draw, dates back to Galileo Galilei, and is best understood, says Lundqvist, when you look at a vibrating string. If you look at the string as it moves up and down, you will see it come back to its original position; if, on the other hand, you watch it as it moves side to side, the end points continue to separate. While we might think of our brains as making similar assessments, Lundqvist says, they might actually be using all of their senses in combination to make their assessments. In the study, a group of subjects were shown a series of silent videos of facial expressions of anger, fear, happiness, sadness or surprise. Then they were shown a set of silhouettes, one for each emotion, and told to choose the facial expression from the video that matched their chosen silhouette. When the emotional video was
