Neutrophils have an important role in the innate immune defense. They are immediate effector cells of the innate immune system and have a key role in tissue responses to tissue injury, infection, or inflammation. Most of the human body bacteria or cell debris are phagocytosed and degraded by neutrophils, with consequential release of neutrophil derived-active products, that is, neutrophil degranulation products. Most of these products are also relevant to the chronic inflammatory processes. The underlying mechanisms of neutrophil responses in the innate immune defense are phagocytosis, bactericidal activity, neutrophil degranulation, and killing of bacteria. In chronic inflammatory diseases, neutrophils infiltrate tissues and are an important source of local, tissue-derived mediators that promote recruitment of additional inflammatory cells and contribute to ongoing tissue injury, remodeling, and fibrosis. Understanding the neutrophil phagocytosis, bactericidal activity, and the subsequent neutrophil degranulation and bacterial killing mechanisms have important implications for understanding the pathophysiology of inflammatory diseases and for the development of treatments for chronic inflammatory diseases.
