Note The Draw Menu (see Figure 1-2 is on the main menu bar, top left. Click the folder icon to find images to open in Photoshop. Click a layer to add it to the active document and open a floating layer palette to begin modifying that layer. When you finish working on that layer, click the dark area inside the shadow box to return to the previous document settings. The menu you see on the main Photoshop window is the Photoshop Toolbox. It contains a collection of various tools—you use them to create different effects on your image—and is shown in Figure 2-1. It also provides a shortcut keyboard option to use Photoshop's tools. Figure 1-2. Need to find more layers to work on? Click the folder icon on the main menu bar to show a list of files waiting to be opened in Photoshop. Click a layer in the Layers palette to make that layer the active layer and edit it. Click the dark area inside the shadow box to return to the previous document settings. If you switch to the View menu, you can change the image display mode: Cycle Thumbs, Tile, or Grid. # Drawing Tools in Photoshop Photoshop provides lots of tools and effects to help you edit and transform an image. After you've opened an image, it's easy to add new layers and effects to the Photoshop layers palette (Figure 2-1). The layers palette acts as a toolbox where you can select any of the tools and effect options for the active layer. Each tool and effect has a button in the toolbox's upper-right corner that you can click to select the tool and apply it to the active layer. You can also apply the tool and then move it to a new location on the image. The toolbox you see in Figure 2-1 shows

Both Photoshop and Photoshop Elements are perfect for anyone who wants to improve images, edit video or create more creative digital art. We compare the two programs to find out which is best for you. Before you make your selection, check out our top five reasons to choose Photoshop Elements. We'll cover some of the popular Photoshop features to help you decide which is right for you. 1. Graphics editing Adobe Photoshop is popular for many reasons. It is the industry standard for digital art and graphic design. It has many of the same features that professional designers use, including adjusting brightness, light and shadows. You can also use it to reshape elements of a photo. But it's not the only game in town. In addition to Photoshop, there are many useful photo editing apps you can use for free. One of the most popular options is Adobe Photoshop Elements. Of course, Photoshop is not limited to editing photos. It is ideal for creating digital art and videos. You can use it to create special effects like stop motion animation, add special effects like the live paintbrush, or to overlay graphics. Many people use

Photoshop to create graphics for their social media websites. The amateur web designer can use Photoshop to create unique website templates. There are plenty of online sites that teach you how to create unique websites using Photoshop. Here are some of the things you can do in both Photoshop and Photoshop Elements. Make your picture pop, using Photoshop's adjustment layers Reshape your images Edit photos using Photoshop elements' adjustments and features Adjust the contrast, brightness and other features in your image Change the color of the image using the Hue/Saturation tool Add a creative special effect Edit video in Photoshop Access lots of useful features for different media types Both have equal features for photos, video and art. The thing to consider is what software you want to use. If you are more a fan of the look and feel of Photoshop, you may enjoy some of its features better. For example, you can use some of the extra features of Photoshop like its Transform tools, the Live Paintbrush, Live Filters, custom brushes, Lightroom's Adjustments, and so on. Adobe Photoshop Elements is similar to Photoshop in many ways. It has most of Photoshop's most popular features. It also has many photo editing features you can use to create and share your own

Q: What is the performance impact of automatically routing in a Net::SMTP server? Using the Net::SMTP server here, and default, the --force parameter is set: $mail = Net::SMTP->new( #use a to set which a local subnet is allowed to hit to => "", #use a host to set which a local subnet is allowed to hit from => 'localhost', #use a port to set which a local subnet is allowed to hit port => 25, #use a username and password to set which a local subnet is allowed to hit #local subnet is defined in /etc/hosts.allow, and can be something like '192.168.0.128' or even '*' user => 'from', passwd => 'password' ); Now, I'm defining a header with X-Forwarded-For, and I'm sending it: $mail->set_header('X-Forwarded-For', $ip); Which looks like it's setting up that header properly, I'm just wondering if there is some kind of performance hit associated with this, and if so, is there a way to turn it off? A: My recommendation is to disable it. Setting headers takes time (once per connection), and if there is a network problem, you really don't want a buggy server to send your mail thinking it is from your ip address. But of course you can easily test it yourself by monitoring your connection and the impact of setting the header manually. If you really do want to use headers, you can set the X-Forwarded-For header after you've successfully send the mail. I really cannot see any performance impact though. [The diagnostic value of needle biopsy of the breast]. A retrospective analysis of 53 needle biopsies performed on 50 patients from 1980 to 1986 was carried out. In the history of 72.6% of the patients there were signs of previous breast trauma. 53.1% were younger than 35 years. In 37.7% of the cases the histological evaluation of the biopsies was performed by

Q: Php, posting a textarea on another page that is calling a form I'm trying to get some text into an input field on a page, after submitting the form. What I have so far is this: The form I have, is a page that's being called from a main page ( that only shows this basic text. I'm not sure if using $_REQUEST is the best way to do this, but it doesn't seem to work (though, I could have done the following by $_GET or $_POST, but that seemed like double work for something that's really simple). Is there another way I can do this (does the header("Location:") command have to go in the form, or is there a way to call it from the main page after the submission of the form)? (I'm not that familiar with PHP so please bear with me.) A: Make sure to add the
