effect of valsartan on cardiovascular responses to mental stress in patients with essential hypertension. Valsartan, an angiotensin II receptor antagonist, has been reported to be beneficial in the treatment of essential hypertension. We have previously shown that valsartan reduced blood pressure after mental stress in patients with essential hypertension.

This study examines the effect of valsartan on cardiovascular responses to mental stress in hypertensive patients. A group of 13 hypertensive patients in treatment with valsartan (160 mg) and another group of 17 in treatment with a placebo were compared. Both groups were exposed to a mental arithmetic test, with blood pressure, heart rate and changes in plasma catecholamine concentrations measured before, during and after the test. Blood pressure was reduced at all time points during the test in the valsartan group, compared with a marked increase in blood pressure in the placebo group. Heart rate and plasma adrenaline and noradrenaline concentrations were significantly increased in the valsartan group during the test, whereas placebo had no effect. These results show that valsartan reduced blood pressure during mental stress in patients with essential
