HyperMotion Technology is used to make several key aspects of gameplay – from controlling passes to passing the ball – more intuitive and realistic. When players pass the ball, FIFA picks up movement data from the soccer ball and reflects this off the player’s on-screen model. For interceptions, players can no longer move completely ‘away’ from the ball, but can turn towards their target. The new player controls also make tackling more realistic. You no longer just instantaneously slide into a tackle if you receive the ball; instead, the game slows down and lets you choose how much time you spend in the tackle. Although the amount of data collected from real-life players was used to power the new "HyperMotion" features, the "Human Intelligence Layer" that runs in parallel to the technology has also been enhanced to include more player-created attributes. With the addition of Real Player Motion (RPM) – a first-of-its-kind motion capture technology in the game – the "HyperMotion" features will be even more authentic. Players can now control movements of their body by selecting different animated actions using the right analog stick. For example, in the skills library, a player can select a jump or a sprint and the RPM technology will reproduce the player’s on-screen movements and gestures in game. (Note: Players will still use their right analog stick to perform directional and aiming actions.) Players will also be able to animate their “X” and “A” buttons in the same way they would use their hands in an actual match, and accelerate the game speed to match the tempo of a live match. “Through the FIFA DNA, we have combined player intelligence and human interaction with the use of real player motion and our never-before-seen motion capture technology,” said Sean Kaminski, general manager of Sports Interactive. “We were able to use the full suite of technologies, including our highly realistic physics engine, and package them in the most exciting way for FIFA 20.” New AI Improvements: In addition to new “HyperMotion” features, FIFA 22 introduces AI improvements, including the “Pitch Vision” and “First Touch AI” systems, as well as additional “Weak Pressing” and “Anti-Press” options that are much more important than before. The new Pitch Vision AI system can
