Sensitive and specific quantitative polymerase chain reaction analysis of chemically modified RNA. Chemical modification of RNA by ethanolic sodium periodate at low pH results in the formation of monoadducts or, more rarely, diadducts. We have shown recently that these chemical modifications alter the rate of spontaneous decay, but not the rate of degradation, of RNA. Here we describe methods to determine the identity and location of a chemical modification at single nucleotide resolution. RNA was made partially phosphorothioate and subsequently reacted with sodium periodate at low pH (analogous to the alkaline treatment of exocyclic amino groups). RNA was purified, first by denaturing ethanol precipitation and then by solid phase extraction. After removal of the chemical modifier, RNA was dephosphorylated and digested with pyridoxal 5'-phosphate and nuclease P1. Monoadducts were identified with [3H]methylation, followed by analysis by polyacrylamide gel electrophoresis in the presence of SDS. Nucleotides 16, 18, and 20 were identified in a mutant of human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) messenger RNA that is deficient in RNAse H activity. RNA was made containing pyridylmethylthiophosphate as the sole modification. Monoadducts were identified with [3H]methylation, by a two-dimensional gel electrophoresis system and high pressure liquid chromatography, and we have developed a rapid quantitative assay for this modification.The day of the week for the release of iOS 9.3 is Monday, October 20, and the release of iOS 9.3.2 is expected shortly after that. Apple seeded developers with iOS 9.3 beta 3 on Wednesday, September 16, and the public beta went live on Friday, September 18. The public beta was 4.22 GB in size, but Apple seeded only the 10.5 GB iBoot.ipsw image file. iOS 9.3.2 is the second iOS update since the release of the iOS 9.3 update in mid-September. The first iOS update, iOS 9.3.1, was released a couple of days after the 9.3 release. The 9.3.1 update was made available only to Developer Enterprise and Developer Program members.
