Solitude.Q: Is EOF in HZ+1? Possible Duplicate: Is EOF in HZ+1? I have a function where I'm doing a read on stdin to see if it is the end of the file, or a newline or a number; it always returns true when I'm testing for the end of the file (EOF) in UNIX. It seems that when I get a newline, I get a character value, not EOF. Is the EOF the 1 in HZ+1? I am aware that it will return 1 if I read beyond the end of a file. I am also aware that EOF can be suppressed by using setvbuf, but I have already confirmed that it is not happening in my case. A: read() returns the number of characters actually read. By definition, the number of characters to be read is the HZ+1 byte that precedes the end of the file. Since you are reading until the end of the file, you are actually reading the byte 1 byte past the end of the file. This is why you are not getting EOF. The end of the file condition is detected by the number of bytes actually read vs the number of bytes to be read. A: Yes, EOF is 1 if you are reading the first byte after the EOF marker. If you are reading anything that falls between the last byte and the EOF, you get a partial read of 1 less than the count passed to read (in your case, 1 less than 255). Q: Missing modifiers in '::convert'

Suppose, I have created a struct that has some properties. struct Root { int Age; int Grade; float Salary; } Then, I have created a class that inherits the class of the Root. struct AddressBook : Root
